6. To prevent inaccuracy in delivery, and inconvenience in the settlement of the Purchases, no Lot can, on any account, be removed during the Sale.

7. Upon failure to comply with the above conditions, the money deposited in part payment shall be forfeited; all Lots uncleared within one day from conclusion of Sale shall be re-sold by public or private sale, without further notice, and the deficiency (if any) attending such re-sale shall be made good by the defaulter at this Sale, together with all charges attending the same. This Condition is without prejudice to the right of the Auctioneer to enforce the contract made at this Sale, without such re-sale, if he thinks fit.

8. The undersigned are in no manner connected with the business of the cartage or packing and shipping of purchases, and although they will afford to purchasers every facility for employing careful carriers and packers, they will not hold themselves responsible for the acts and charges of the parties engaged for such services.

PREFATORY NOTE

IN the early seventies a group of young American art students, pursuing the exacting curriculum of the Antwerp Academy of Fine Arts, found themselves persuaded that there was something beyond the horizon which bounded the crypt-like class-rooms of that venerable institution, and began to look outside into the world of art, which they were soon to enter upon with the youthful anticipations of speedy success. The mentor of this little coterie of enthusiastic young men was a newcomer, himself a student, but a student with a more settled purpose and a more reasonable and logical ambition than any of us. Compared with his enthusiasm, our emotions seemed tame and cold; we dreamed over processes, he gloried in results. We believed in the school of the Netherlands with a faith that was almost religious; he awakened our interest and developed our belief in the school of France. Our ideas were cramped and narrow because we had been long preoccupied with the absorbing study of the rudiments of the profession; his views on art were broad because, although he could not yet claim a place in the ranks of artists, he had been in close touch with some of the eminent men in the profession and had gained from this intercourse a balance of judgment which no student in the Academy possessed. That newcomer was Robert Crannel Minor, and, although he came as a stranger to most of us, his influence made itself felt at once.

He had been painting a year or two in America, latterly under the direction of Alfred C. Howland, whose proiciency was a great stimulus to his ambition. While working with Howland he began to feel that if he was to make a success as a landscape painter, it was necessary for him to seek his inspiration at the fountain head. This idea grew until he could no longer resist the call, and he left New York and joined the colony of painters in Barbizon at the time when that school was in the apogee of its success. He worked hard for a season there under the personal influence and more or less under the direction of Diaz until, probably overpowered by the splendor of the accomplishment of his master and recognizing his own lack of training, he came to Antwerp to study under Van Luppen, a landscape painter of wide renown and with an admirable technique. From him he learned the deliberate method of the Netherland school, and for a time it seemed as if he would be so influenced by this method that he would be in danger of losing that point of view in art which distinguished him above his fellow-students. But he was only acquiring the alphabet, and he had the good judgment to strike out for himself as soon as he had become familiar with the method which the Flemish master was so well qualified to teach.

From that time to the end of his career he did not turn aside in any notable instances from his chosen path, and the influence of the Barbizon school of landscape, which was the strongest power in directing his efforts at the beginning, remained potent with him to the end.

The collection of pictures he left behind him amply proves that he was an ardent student of nature and that, while he did not attempt to cover a wide range of motives, either in composition or in effect, he was absorbed with the effort to express the charm of the hour when the landscape takes on its most suggestive and enchanting aspect, the dawn or the approaching twilight. A large proportion of his pictures are sunsets, and although he studied with equal ardor the effects of early morning, he was evidently fascinated by the more glorious color of the evening and by the mystery of twilight.

The pictures listed in this catalogue comprise all the works which he left behind him with the exception of a certain number of studies which the executor of his estate has decided to present to various art institutions. Among them will be found a variety of subjects, one or two recalling the period of his Belgian experiences and several interesting souvenirs of his travels in different parts of Europe. They chiefly represent, however, his artistic life in this country, where he found in Connecticut and in the Adirondacks motives which appealed to him as strongly as those in the Forest of Fontainebleau did to the group of landscape painters at Barbizon. These pictures are not topographical; they do not deal, primarily, with botany nor with the ordinary characteristics of the American landscape. They are as far as can be from the productions of the so-called Hudson River school. But they give us an interpretation of the charm of nature which depends little on latitude or climate, and he records for our enjoyment the rare effects of light and the rare combination of rich colors which those who have eyes may see in nature if they look for them. In these pictures may be read the story of his consistent and unflagging enthusiasm. Even in his last illness, when he was for a long time confined to his bed, he continued to work as much as his strength would permit, for his hand was steady, his mind was clear and his purpose intense. Almost to the last hour of his life he continued to paint, because, like a true artist, he was never satisfied with his efforts.
